In this work, we presented the concentration of the main pollutants of the atmosphere of the capital of the state of Pará, i.e., the city of Belém (PA). We sampled the air by means of automatic air samplers, with H1 (1.16 mg/L) and H2 (0.75 mg/L) cartridges, at three meteorological stations, namely Vaz Conselheiro, Vimbozal and Rio Herval (air temperature = 23°C; humidity = 52%). The concentration of SO₂, NO₂, and CO were quantified by means of a continuous wavelet transform (the technique devised by Vereček et al., 2002) applied to series of Cartesian coordinates of the sampled air (x, y and z) of equidistant time, thus using two periods - the first corresponding to the minimum air flow rate of the sampler and the second to the maximum air flow rate. Using the so-called "quality criteria", we evaluated the stations' compliance with the air quality standards established by the WHO, as contained in the guidelines for the protection of human health against the effects of indoor and outdoor air pollution (WHO, 1999). On the basis of the obtained results, the concentrations of SO₂, NO₂ and CO, were respectively, 23, 106, and 184 ppm for H1, and 0.80, 5.02 and 3.32 ppm for H2, showing a more satisfactory result when compared to the concentrations registered in the air of the whole state of Pará.
