01 August 2007 Day in and day out, I attend grand rounds. During each round, I'm usually required to participate in one of the cases. There is one case, in particular, that is particularly intriguing to me. I can't help but get sucked in. It's called Closed Induced Fracture in the Brain. It's the rape of the brain. Upon physical examination, it should be evident that a child or older adult sustained a serious brain injury in a car, truck, motorcycle, or another vehicle accident. The patient is comatose. The intracranial pressure is elevated. The patient lives in a coma. There is no concern for cardiopulmonary arrest. The patient has a head injury. The patient has a hematoma or subdural hematoma. The patient has a subarachnoid hemorrhage. The patient has a comminuted skull fracture. All of these are on the expected list. On the important list, not. So here's what you're up against. The patient is in a coma. Comatose. And this patient has a hematoma, subdural hematoma, and a skull fracture. All three of these things together are enough to indicate that, after a subdural hematoma, the brain is under increased pressure and can't get oxygenated blood, so the brain swells. The next item on the list is that there is a ruptured small capillary in the brain. These are fragile little things. They are supercharged capillaries. These are the ones that burst and bleed. If you can't get oxygenated blood to the brain when the brain swells, then the brain swells and ruptures these little capillaries and bleeds. The bleeding is out of control. The swelling pushes on the brain matter between the skull and the brain. This is where the word epidural subdural hematoma comes from. The swelling pushes and the brain gets into that space. Within 24-48 hours, the swelling causes pressure on the brain. This can cause the patient to decompensate. This means that the brain is no longer capable of dealing with the intracranial pressure and the swelling. This means that the intracranial pressure causes serious problems for the brain. After this, the patient can die or remain in a coma. During a scan, if
